What's New in the?

(CNN) — The winner of the US presidential election might not have the easiest path to taking office, as he or she still faces a legal challenge over accepting the electoral college's vote. Hours after Donald Trump's surprise victory over Hillary Clinton was confirmed, an electoral college member from Hawaii questioned whether electors could break the tie and potentially deny the Republican their majority. And Democratic members of Congress expressed frustration over the Electoral College vote. Democratic Ohio Rep. Marcia Fudge posted a message on Twitter saying she was "confused." "At a time when women are all over the world speaking out and standing up and being empowered to take back their rights, does the President-Elect stand with Donald Trump?" she wrote. Earlier in the week, the US president-elect's campaign manager, Kellyanne Conway, said that "if the system is institutionally corrupt, then it can be hacked by a third party," she told CNN's "New Day." "We have done everything we can, to the best of our ability, to make sure there's a fair electoral process going forward and that everything is done to show respect. So that's going to be the President-elect's call," she said. The winner of the US presidential election will be inaugurated January 20. In a joint statement, House speaker John Boehner and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said: "During the electoral college vote count in each state, we have asked the states to ensure that every vote is properly counted and transmitted. "We are deeply disappointed in the results of the election and we offer our congratulations to Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton and her hardworking team." Correspondents say it is possible that Trump would not easily navigate the legal challenges facing him. A petition has been launched at the White House asking the Obama administration to not certify the winner of the 2016 presidential election in time for it to leave office on January 20. Reps. Keith Ellison and John Lewis, the Congressional Black Caucus Chair and Georgia Democrat, said they were "concerned" with the actions of the Electoral College. "Concerned" is a term of art used in political science to indicate that a person or group isn't too upset about something because they're going to
