I need this file to be a place to define my global middleware. Right now I have to put the code into App.js file. import './utils/site.js'; export default class App extends React.Component { ... } I did a little research and found that the'site.js' file should be located in /public directory. My question is whether or not this is a good practice. Or is there something that I don't know? I am new to react. A: Nope, this is not a good practice. Site.js is a convention for writing global middleware, but in a way that it is specific to your express server stack of choice. It's not a convention for what JS/NPM should use as default to load global middleware. For good measure, this would cause a lot of confusion to someone coming from a different server stack. Instead I'd recommend you use a library like create-react 1cdb36666d

Yet most of us have somewhere to go when we need it, including over 1,000 designated urban camping sites across the province. In order to access these sites, we must abide by bylaws that protect and promote the sites — from removing tents and snowmobiles to keeping campfires a minimum of 25 metres away from park infrastructure. But it can be difficult to enforce these rules. Besides there being a lack of police presence, many campers are unaware that the rules apply to them. They don't pay licensing fees for the sites they use, but they feel like they are on park land. Although I'm not from Alberta, the conditions in Fort McMurray and other locations are shocking enough that I feel compelled to speak out. This is why I created MyBestWildlife.ca — a website that lists all the resources to inform campers about the rules, and also promotes the legal recourse for those that infringe the rules. Many of us know that when we hear stories like this, we also worry about our own safety. My point is to clarify that sometimes there is another side to the story — the side of fairness, justice and safety. Camping should be a right of all Albertans
